440 NOTES

When the bells, once more, rang out from the various shops at the hour of quitting time, a daily Anglo-Saxon who was employed in the United Steel Company, of this city, is said to have written a message to some friends, which, in part, reads as follows:

"We've had these days proceeding in a manner more like the days of life in the cities of the Far East than we have in the past. Now, we're going to have a strike, and we're going to make it stick. While there are some differences in the method of combining the workers in all parts of the country, the result will be the same. We're going to make this strike a success, and we're going to be better off for it."

The industrial workers of the United Steel Company have prepared for a strike, and they have a very good reason for it. The company has been operating under a contract which expired on October 1st, and there has been no agreement made with the workers since that time. The workers feel that they have been taken advantage of, and they are determined to stand for their rights. The strike is expected to be a long one, and the workers are well prepared for it. They have a strong union, and they are backed by the workers of other cities. The company, on the other hand, is not prepared for a strike. They have not made any plans for what they will do if the workers strike. The company is likely to lose a great deal of business if the workers strike, and they are likely to be in a difficult position. The workers are likely to gain a great deal if they win the strike. They will be better off financially, and they will have more respect and power for their union. The strike is expected to be a long one, and the workers are well prepared for it.
